Olfactory reference signal-dependent mitogen-activated protein kinase cascades in a Drosophila olfactory projection neuron: a target for odor-dependent modulations of gene expression. The output of the Drosophila olfactory system is relayed in two distinct pathways, each of which generates a stereotyped motor command to the leg. The first pathway relays odorant information from the olfactory receptor neuron to the second-order neuron, whose dendrites and axon selectively innervate the leg motoneurons and activate them to control the legs. A central question is how the olfactory information is conveyed to the motoneuron target and how it can be modulated by the leg movement. Here we describe the synaptic output of the second-order neuron (DPM2) and its subcellular distribution. We also demonstrate that the spatial separation of the second-order neuron is controlled by two functionally distinct olfactory reference signals. The second-order neuron is restricted to a neuronal domain that correlates with the division of the leg into functional segments. Furthermore, we demonstrate that a regulated change in a target gene, the homer gene, is modulated by the behavioral context. You won't find this gear in your local thrift store. I don't think you can find this stuff on any clearance rack of any local sporting goods store. Here are some tips on how to spot quality parts. * Search your local pawn shop for used asr gear for sale. They are not always clean but as long as they are not stolen it will be ok. If a shop offers to pay for shipping to your location it is usually stolen. * Look at used asr parts - You want to go with quality. Don't buy anything that is well used unless you have the patience to get it all cleaned up. * Look for fender stickers. Can you read the stickers on the fenders? - Check the conditions of the headlight stickers - At the dealer level when parts came off a vehicle there were stickers placed on the headlight, check them out. * Check out the wheel arch type.
